On Thursday, U.S. District Judge Jon S. Tigar of the Northern District of California said the Trump administration's current asylum system, which the State Department announced this week it was expanding, violated the due process rights of immigrants who had already been denied asylum in the past. He ordered the administration to reinstate the previous asylum system — known as the “Central American Minors” process — through Oct. 19. [For migrants in limbo, the U.S. asylum system has created a labyrinth] Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) had announced on Wednesday that the State Department would begin accepting asylum requests for migrants traveling alone from certain Central American countries and Sudan, as well as other countries in the western hemisphere. But on Thursday, the government announced that it was withdrawing the policy. In a statement Thursday, the State Department said that while they are continuing to work on the expansion of the “Central American Minors” system, they are now pausing that process. That means the U.S. will accept asylum applications for people from those countries who have already been denied asylum in the past but are now traveling alone from the same countries. “The government has decided to halt the launch of the rollout of the Central American Minors while it continues to work on the final language and formulation of the Central American Minors policy,” the statement said. “The Department will continue to accept and process Central American Minors, consistent with the Administration’s long-standing authority to grant asylum in those circumstances.” [What it’s like to live in a migrant tent city in the U.S.] Tigar, an Obama appointee, had initially ruled in February that the current asylum system violated the 82157476af
